

THE SEX INSTINCT.

A Portland dispatch says that women form the greater proportion of the visitors to the Igorrote village and that they seem to fairly revel in the dogkilling scenes. Continuing, this dispatch says:

"Eighty per cent of the spectators at the dog feasts held at the Igorrote village at the Lewis and Clark exposition are women. They seem to delight in witnessing the butchery, and when the young Igorrote chief who does the killing applies his knife to the dog's throat they crowd around as close as they can get to see the red flow. The greater part of the visitors to the village thus far have been women, and the attendants say it has always been thus. At St. Louis, whenever a dog feast was to be given, women were always in the majority. The attendants here are fairly besieged with requests from women, highly educated and dainty, who ask that they be notified when the next feast is held, in order that they may be there."

Allow us to suggest that it is not the dogkilling that so much attracts the women as the handsome young Igorrote men. The male Igorrote wears no clothes excepting only a very meagre breechclout and when young, is undeniably as handsome a specimen of manhood as can be found anywhere on earth. It is a treat to look at his smooth dusky skin and the exquisite symmetry of his all but perfect body. We are not surprised that the female of our species crowds around him to feast her eyes. We around the naked male savages at St. Louis and at the World's fair at Chicago and, in the same connection it may as well be said that the tendency of the men at all these places was to hang about places where the female savage was to be seen unadorned. This was particularly noticeable at the Hawaii village at Chicago, where the most beautiful Kanaka belles were to be seen clad only in elaborate feather skirts that reached only from the waist to a point midway between the hips and knees, and also at the Dahomey reservation where native girls with shiny black skins, walked about wearing little more than a narrow belt around their loins. They were constantly followed by the eyes of admiring crowds of males.

The fact noted in the Portland dispatch and by our observations at Chicago and St. Louis is, after all, only the primitive sex instinct. You may refine, cultivate and educate as you will, this sex instinct remains predominant in the human race. It is the survival of the original animal. We may try to cover it by talking vaguely of the art of pleasure derived from gazing on beauty unadorned, but its nothing of the sort. It's the lust of the flesh and when this sex instinct disappears, our race will disappear from the earth.—Pocatello Tribune.

Acre Undergoes Changes.

"Acre" comes from the Latin "ager," a field, and originally was applied without reference to its size, the term being used in England indefinitely for a long period.
